Why it's good for children to be bored

In days gone by before our current 'Screen Age', children's cries of "It's sooo boring!" or "I'm bored!" were often met with the one solution: "Go outside and play!"

It seems these parents were really onto something. Research globally shows that allowing children to feel boredom and encouraging them to create activities to fill the space can be a springboard to building better emotional wellbeing and mental health. And this is a state that should be encouraged not avoided.

Is this something that you remember being told as a child? Find out why something that annoyed you so much as a child was actually so great for your wellbeing by reading more here:
